請依下文回答第 46 題至第 50 題

When a woman writer first starts writing a story, she often chooses to write about her relationship with her mother. As a common experience shared by all women, women writers regardless of her class, race, culture and language all engage themselves in writing about this subject. They do not abandon this topic even after they grow in their craft. Another reason why they are so enthusiastic about writing this theme is because it is one of their most personal and intimate relationships which greatly influences their relationships with other people. In their writing about mother-daughter relationships, they not only express their feelings of joy and happiness but also their fears and anxiety because not all mothers and daughters experience their relationship in the same way. Some have a peaceful and enjoyable relationship while others have a difficult and bitter relationship. As mixed feelings do exist between mothers and daughters, many women writers also attend to the dark side of this relationship. As a result, they often write about the separation between mothers and daughters if their relationship is hard to resolve. Despite this, a common practice between women writers is to establish a reconnection between mothers and daughters after settling down their harsh relationship.

In The Joy Luck Club, a classic fiction about mother-daughter relationships, the Chinese American author, Amy Tan, writes about her relationship with her mother, who originally came from China. Being an American herself, Tan cannot totally understand her mother's Chinese way of thinking. As her mother speaks less fluent English and sometimes behaves strangely in front of people, Tan feels ashamed of her and even has quarrels with her often. It is only until her mother dies that Tan begins to realize the truth about her mother. Replacing her mother's position in the joy luck club, a group run by her mother and other friends, who Tan call aunts, Tan starts to know more about her mother's stories and even discovers that her mother has lost daughters in China. Helping her mother to carry out her unfulfilled wish, Tan goes on a journey in search of her mother's lost daughters in China. The story ends by having Tan reunited with her mother's lost daughters in China, symbolizing a restoration of her mother-daughter relationship. The final scene describes a tearful moment when Tan and her half-sisters embrace each other and see their mother's reflection shown in the photo they have taken together.
