According to scientists, 80% of a person's weight gain comes from genetics and 20% comes from the person's environment. Today, more than 130 gene families have been found to have some link to weight gain or weight loss in people. For example, a family of genes allows people to change extra fat into heat instead of storing the fat in the body. Another gene family may affect how quickly the stomach lets the brain know that it is full. If the passage of this information slows down, people may eat more than they really need; their appetite becomes larger than others.

Different people use different amounts of energy when they are resting and just breathing. In an experiment, researchers measured the energy a person used for breathing only. Some people burned about 1,000 calories for breathing per day while others burned up to 3,000 calories. Those people who burn fewer calories doing normal work or exercise have a slower metabolism and turn out to gain more weight.

In addition to genes, a person's environment has something to do with being fat or thin. Exercise is an efficient way to lose weight. One researcher in Canada found that most people in a group of 47 showed improvement building muscles in only three weeks of workouts.

26. Scientists believe that a person's _____ has more to do with the person's weight than other reasons.
(A) exercise (B) nature (C) environment (D) size

27. What kind of gene does a person prefer if the person intends to lose weight?
- (A) The gene that uses and burns fat.
 (B) The gene that stores fat in the body.
 (C) The gene that causes an enormous appetite.
 (D) The gene that burns 1,000 calories per day.
28. If a person's genes are slow to let his brain know the stomach is full, the person will ____.
- (A) build more muscles (B) have a poor appetite
 (C) lose weight (D) put on weight
29. What does the word "metabolism" in the second paragraph mean?
- (A) The 130 gene families that are linked to a person's weight.
 (B) The amount of work scientists recommend to a person who is dieting.
 (C) The chemical activities in a body that burn food to produce energy.
 (D) The level of physical workouts a person should have.
30. The Canadian researcher who studied exercise found that ____
- (A) exercise had a positive effect on the majority of people.
 (B) all people's bodies changed after regular exercise.
 (C) physical workouts had a limited influence on burning fat.
 (D) three weeks of exercise wasn't long enough to get a result.
