fresh eyes. All of which makes for a pretty compelling case for having a hobby. But which hobby should you choose? If you're looking for a few ideas, science has an unexpected suggestion: try singing.

Why is singing special? First, it's often social. We sing with others in a garage band, church choir, or local chorus. Raising your voice together in this way isn't just an activity like any other that helps you meet new people—it actively helps you form close bonds with those new acquaintances, according to research.

Singing isn't just a form of emotional glue that helps bond us to others. Solo singing offers plenty of unique benefits, too. That's the subject of a recent piece in The Conversation by singing professor Melissa Forbes, who lays out singing's many mental and physical health benefits. "Singing is increasingly being used to help improve respiratory health for a wide range of health conditions, including chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, Parkinson's, asthma, and cancer," Forbes points out.

Even if you're lucky enough to have a healthy set of lungs, you might want to consider singing to improve your mental health, Forbes argues. _____ does singing help calm your mental chatter and recenter your body, but it also encourages what psychologists call "flow state." This is the state of mind in which you've lost track of time because you're so deeply immersed in an activity.

If you're in the market for an accessible hobby with proven social, physical, and mental benefits, maybe consider adding more singing to your life.
