四、閱讀測驗【請依照段落上下文意,選出最適當的答案】

第一篇

Leadership and management skills are something that rarely comes naturally to most people. But if you follow some basic rules and are willing to learn how to work with people, you will have things running much more smoothly in the workplace. Here's a list of some major things you should not be doing.

First, neglecting employees. Your workers are your business and they have to be treated properly. Failing to attend to workers can be a financial and productivity drag for any business. Workers are people with feelings and emotions and need to be told in many ways how important they are to the company.

Second, shunning criticism. Being in a leadership position does not mean that you suddenly become immune to making wrong decisions. As a leader you must listen to constructive criticism and make necessary changes. If a worker cares enough to share his or her thoughts, the least you can do is listen.

Third, _____. You have to trust that your workers can do the things you have done for so long. A big part of leadership and management is about making sure that things run smoothly and efficiently, and that does not mean running from job to job doing everything yourself.

Fourth, knowing everything. Many of the world's greatest leaders are people of average intelligence who don't know all there is to know in their industry. They understand that they can't possibly know everything and they just need to hire people who do know their thing in their field.

Fifth, lacking focus. Obviously, there will be things that come up during the day and require immediate action that will distract you from your work, but you must have a clear set of priorities to follow. Doing a little bit of everything gets nothing finished, causing stress and feelings of being overwhelmed among employees.

Lastly, avoiding reforms. Holding on to old ways of doing things just because they've always been done that way is a sure way to lose business. If any aspect of the business can be improved then there has to be change, even if this means getting rid of a poorly performing worker or a product range that is no longer profitable.

The opposite of subliminal advertising is shockvertising. Shockvertising uses exaggerated sexual, violent, or offensive images or slogans. These advertisements can bring attention to health issues like smoking, public safety campaigns such as those about drunk driving, and many other causes, including wars.

Shockvertising often brings discomfort among the public. An anti-smoking campaign in Britain showed people whose lips were pulled on by fish hooks. The advertisements were trying to illustrate how people get "hooked" on cigarettes. The campaign received hundreds of complaints about the violence of the ads, but it turned out to be highly effective.

Studies report that shockvertising does significantly increase audience attention and memory of the ad. A study compared readers' retention of a shocking ad, a warning ad, and an informational ad promoting safe sex to stop the spread of AIDS. The shocking ad outperformed the other two, and the researchers suggested that shockvertising causes more long-term behavioral changes than other marketing strategies do.

Italian clothing manufacturer United Colors of Benetton regularly runs advertising campaigns labeled shocking by many critics. Their early advertisements aimed to portray peace where conflict was expected: a Palestinian and a Jew with their arms around each other or a priest and a nun kissing. Into the 1990s, Benetton drew attention to the AIDS epidemic with an image of a man dying of AIDS while his family sat by mournfully. People seemed mostly to resent that Benetton was profiting from these sometimes tragic pictures. In response, the company maintains that it is trying to help solve global problems.

Not surprisingly, shockvertising can go too far for some viewers. Some studies show that when the message of the campaign is too discouraging, viewers tune out. Rather than paying extra attention, people turn a blind eye.

Also, television channels might show their disapproval. The organization responsible for supervising TV commercials in Britain once refused an adagainst domestic violence. The ad shows a woman returning home to an angry boyfriend who throws her to the ground and kicks her. The makers of the adassert that the ad is violent because the issue is violent, but the censoring agency judged it too intense to be aired.
